THAT'S the price paid by The News for just one of the series of Short Stories which it will publish in the next few weeks.

Never-before-published stories they are, by first-rank writers—not reprints.

Newspapers usually reprint stories after they have appeared in magazines. But not The News—it's a different kind of newspaper in this as in other ways.

Read the names of the writers shown at the left. Then tell your newsdealer you want The News delivered every morning.

CHARLES L. FREER, Wealthy Art Connoisseur, Dies

Gave Famous Collection to the Smithsonian Institution, With $1,000,000 for Home

Charles Lang Freer, wealthy art connoisseur, who presented his famous collection to the Smithsonian Institution and then gave $1,000,000 for a building to house it, died suddenly yesterday morning in the Hotel Goddard. Mr. Freer was on a visit here from his home in Detroit. His body will be sent to his birth place at Kingston, N. Y., where the funeral will take place Monday.

Mr. Freer was born sixty-six years ago. He never married, and was engaged in railway service and manufacturing in Detroit. Several years ago he retired from active business life and devoted himself to travel and research.

"My pleasure," he once said, "has been in discovery and not in possession." He has accumulated a remarkable collection of paintings, sculpture, Biblical manuscripts and other rare bits of art during his years of travel, and he immediately began planning how to present them to the public. After much deliberation Mr. Freer sold the collection. He sold it for one dollar to the board of regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Among the gifts presented to the nation by Mr. Freer are 1,200 specimens of Whistler's work, among them the great Peacock Room; 100 paintings by great American artists, 1,200 pieces of ancient glazed pottery, 800 paintings on screens in scroll and kakemono form from Japan and China, and numerous pieces of sculpture from all over the world.

About forty-five years ago Mr. Freer went to Logansport, Ind., to work on the El River Railroad. He soon rose to be a director at $2,000 a year. When the railroad was sold to the Government, he and Frank J. Hecker started the Peninsular Car Company. It continued to grow until they sold out for several millions each. After that Mr. Freer began devoting most of his time to his collections.

Mr. Freer was a member of the Greater Society and Players Club in this city, and the Caxton Club in Chicago.

A Profitable Quest

Oscar Graeve Strikes A New Note in Fiction

YOUTH GOES SEEKING. By Oscar Graeve. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co.

The great restlessness with which modern youth is blessed, or afflicted, charges with animation the four young characters of Graeve's well written and, well sustained story. The plot of his novel is simple and concerns the striving of Henry Baker, a boy brought up in a conservative Brooklyn family, to throw off the shackles of decayed industrial methods and find for himself some way of being a friend to man without making an utter ass of himself.

Coming to New York, he takes a room in West Eleventh Street and is fascinated for a time by the unconventionalism of Ann Corcoran, beautiful, clever, hard—a girl who has neither firm courage nor firm convictions. Aimlessly swept along by the novelty of the life which Ann and her friends live, Henry drifts about until chance and a driving rash throw on his doormat a little waif of an eastward whose strength is a loyal affection for the man who befriends her.

Through circumstances thrust upon him because of his stance support of Sadie and his determination to stand by her, Henry ultimately returns to his uncle and aunt in Brooklyn and buckles down to carrying out in a practical manner the vaguely formulated social and industrial ideas which had taken him to New York.

Graeve has written his book with no exaggerations. Chapter follows chapter with the ordered display of normal and abnormal incidents which goes to shape the destiny of most ordinary mortals. But the author of "Youth Goes Seeking" has stood off and so obtained a perspective of the events which surround a youth of Henry Baker's sort that his transcription of them is cluttered by no confusion of irrelevant detail.

Poet's Verse Illumined By Tragedy of His Life

SONNETS of Herbert Scholfield. Alfred A. Knopf.

This slender gray volume has much to say of a personality and those who prefer that their art shall be abstract and impersonal, a thing of absolute beauty unrelated to time or place or individual, will be disposed to turn from it. There is the other theory of literature, however. The poetry of poets would be great poetry if it were a relic of a vanished civilization, found carved on stone and we know nothing of the conditions of its life or death. But would it be fair to say that his personality, his tragedy, his physical sufferings and his death would count for nothing in his literary monument? His personality would be present before the reader, it can be urged, whether we had from history the faded record of his day.

The story of Herbert Scholfield is the life of an artist, a life of a man who has an army of invalids condemned to a life apart in an Adirondack community. He knows no other way to write than to let down the reactions of his heart and mind to this central tragedy of his life. His technical equipment is inferior to his technical. Sometimes his beliefs are sincerely with articulations of phrases, sometimes it falls to sheer impotence. Such success as he has is the unaccountable ability of deep emotion, working in solid and white silence, somehow to find utterances. Perhaps his Fifty-third Sonnet displays his success and failure as fairly as any:

When in my thought I see the precious

Whose life's light taper could be lit

With that sweet one my heart is so

I would have felt his weight upon my

His heart upon my shoulder fondly laid,

With me to guard him from all touch of

His third heart need never be afraid.

Then, sudden by my side that specter grim

Before whose power the head must

I could not see my little one from him.

Nor ward the blow which would from him

In his descent.

To keep that child from falling thus a

For very love I let him fade away.

Easy to set off at such writing, but Very hard to forget. It is common to Speak of a lifelong illness as a handicap. But such a volume as this makes one wonder. There is a terrible cost—harrowing sacrifice. There is, on the other hand, a clear gain in stead-fastness, in vision, in light to shine far beyond Adirondack hills. G. P.
